About PULSUS

Laser is a device that emits light after the stimulated emission of electromagnetic radiation. Light is also called as photons and the study about the light is called Photonics. The application of laser, optics and photonics are ubiquitous which includes from day to day life to most advanced sciences. Optics has become a backbone for both internet and telephony. Since the discovery of laser, the laser research has produced a many variety of improved and specialized laser types. The use of laser in the field of surgery is slightly increased over the years. Much advancement has been made in this period of time and yet many advances are needed. The factor that drives the growth of laser technology is the increasing demand in the healthcare sector and the shift towards the production of Nano devices and micro devices which has the enhanced performance over the traditional processing techniques. The laser technology market for optical communication is expected to grow during 2017-2022.
